What's new:

| Privacy in The Mojave: The Universe That Never Was I'd like to let you know that my study has concluded … that you are a fool. You follow method because you lack empathy. And, therefore, you say that you take no pride in your faults. You're wrong. Like the other slivers of odd you, you're proud to be the asshole that proves everybody else is. I have come to a new conclusion about myself: I wasn't always this way. Through the force of magic, the poignancy of writing, my time in Moiraine's spell, I have evolved as a person. I have spent the last month reexamining myself and my existence. I have grown, and can only hope that the sins I want to cast them on you are steps of a ladder I may climb to escape yourself. My conclusions are simple. Human life is fundamentally flawed. That much is undeniable. That much is finite. I don't want to brag, but I'm approaching the state of a Buddha. So that proves it. I have ultimately grown up, and it feels good. It has been a hard road to travel. I've had great joy. I've had the most painful relationship in my life. I can blame the person I'm with if I want, but that still leaves me cold. That still fails to explain why I'm all in a tizzy about everything. I have not achieved true enlightenment. That's okay, because I'm young, and, honestly, I don't have all that many years left. After last night, I rethought that. I think that the real work requires a constant, unwavering detachment from my previous self — the person that was me. No, I do not blame you. (Except for what I'm about to blame you for.) Perhaps you've already walked into my rant (and I thank you for following along), or perhaps you don't. That's fine, because I've really got work to do. My old life, the Seven-Year Plan Moving to California, at the behest of my ex-boyfriend, was supposed to fix my life. Nope. My story is too boring. Instead, I'm writing this little ole�
