Let us remark that ϵ can be computed as the first time (among all the iterations) that f_i becomes non-negligible. The endpoints of the interval between two consecutive fixed points is computed as the limit of the maximum of the values of f_i during its interval of definition. It is therefore equal to $3 + \frac{1}{\sqrt{2}}$ approx 3.35. For a more precise proof, it suffices to study the behavior of f_i on an interval in which f_i does not vanishes. This proves the full interval

Twitter Inc. warned on Wednesday that a more aggressive regulatory crackdown on dodgy behaviour among social media companies could be coming in the weeks ahead and added that it is "actively considering" an emergency disclosure of at least some of its financial results. Last year, Canada's securities regulator introduced the so-called "safe harbour" rules, which require social media companies to disclose a broad set of financial information to keep users confident they can trust what they are seeing online. In a call with investors, Chief Executive Jack Dorsey said Twitter was exploring a two-part plan involving first disclosing its regular operating results followed by a statement acknowledging the issue and confirming it is in the midst of a broad review of its own policies, practices and products. Story continues below advertisement That information, Dorsey said, would come on the heels of a regulatory crackdown that some worry could be forthcoming from Canadian, British, U.S. and European regulators. Twitter's investors have been increasingly antsy after the company's shares lost about 20 per cent of their value since the regulatory clampdown last October. This included a roughly 20-per-cent drop in the price of its Class A shares on Wednesday. Some of this stock volatility is likely to be related to more public disclosures by Twitter and other social media firms that they are being investigated. For example, Facebook Inc. has faced similar investor confusion after disclosing in late November that it is under investigation by regulators. In the Twitter call, Dorsey said the company is having a "major conversation" on "what our approach needs to be in the months ahead." He added that while there is "widely shared" concern about the impact on users, he and the rest of the executive team remained confident
