A: The problem is in the Android documentation: When calling `URLConnection.connect()` from a Thread, you must implement the callback interface `DownloadListener`, which will be called with the result of the download, and may be called from any thread. That's why you have your return false; in the main thread. It should be called in your `AsyncTask` so the connection is done. Q: Drupal 7 - Check if field exists when submitting node I'm trying to make a very simple function that checks if a certain field already exists in the database. Then, if it does, it should not continue on with the submit. As you can see, I'm already using `hook_node_validate`. I've tried using `hook_node_insert`, but the `SubmitHandler` function seems to fire before the validation process can take place (i.e. a NULL value is returned for the `$node` variable). Any idea how I can do this? function `mymodule_validate($form, &$form_state) { if (!empty($form_state['values']['myfield'])) { return $form['myfield']; } else { return $form; } }` function `mymodule_submit($form, &$form_state) { if ($form_state['values']['myfield']) { return; } $node = node_submit($form, $form_state); $node = node_submit($form, $form_state); }` The above code only returns `$form` on submit, but I want to add a check to determine if the node is being created or being updated. That might be needed if the form is being submitted to an endpoint that requires a node to be present for the creation. I don't really want to just have a return for that value as a solution, since that will apply to all processes. A: `hook_node_insert()` is not intended to be used from outside the node submit handlers. Drupal 7 offers a mechanism for such checks, which is called the `entity_validation_callback()`. If you use the entity module, this callback is taken care of for you. If you don't use the entity module, you need to implement that callback manually.

Significantly higher correlation between subjective pain intensity and psychometric testing than between laboratory outcome measures. To assess the relationship between subjective pain intensity and subjective responses to painful stimuli, and to establish a psychophysical method for assessment of pain in the primary sensory somatosensory system (SII). Visual analogue and numerical rating scales (NRS) were used to register subjective pain intensity on ten different days for eight groups of patients suffering from diverse painful conditions. Seventy-one of these patients were tested with verbalization-compatible, multimodal painful stimulations, such as pinprick, probing, and joint tapping in an attempt to record nociceptive SII responses using a psychophysical method. Algometry (pressure pain threshold (PPT) and thermal pain threshold (TPT)), cold pressor test, and patellar compression test were used to evaluate somatic and visceral nociceptive (SII) and/or muscular-skeletal (SMC) systems. The subjective NRS values correlated significantly with corresponding psychophysical variables, such as PPT ($r = 0.71$), TPT ($r = 0.68$), pain threshold to pinprick ($r = 0.70$), pain threshold to cold ($r = 0.60$), pain threshold to joint tapping ($r = 0.72$), and cold pain tolerance ($r = 0.67$). The subjects achieved significantly higher pain threshold values in response to pinprick and joint tapping than to cold pressor test. Pain intensity correlates significantly with psychophysical testing using verbalization-compatible painful stimulation. However, psychophysical testing requires a much larger sample size to establish clinical cut-off values for objective pain assessment. [Analysis of metabolic and functional changes in the peripheral blood of rats during immobilization stress]. Results are reported on chemical analysis of two types of cells in the peripheral blood of rats during immobilization stress: thrombocytes and mononuclear phagocytic system cells. It is shown that both these cell types undergo specific metabolic changes during immobilization stress which are associated with development of a stress state in the organism. Cell acid-base status is also modified. A hypothesis is advanced that throm
