The project features a series of sculptures made from salvaged materials, including old paint cans, swimming pool fencing, storm-drain tubing, highway patrol signs, pole scrap, and broken vases. The sculptures are left in public spaces and visitors are invited to take them home for free. Background Fuss was an art student in the 1990s and a frequent visitor to the Tampa Bay area. He began to perceive decaying utility and transportation infrastructure as poetic objects of beauty. Fascinated by the idea of salvaging materials from the world around him, the artist began the first series of Free the Roof Garden sculptures. The first sculptures were installed in 1997 as salvaged signs from a six-lane highway, which were stuck to the side of a housing complex in the Middleton neighborhood of Tampa. Fuss began installing the sculpture outside of the complex's entrance, and later, outside of the complex's mail room, both of which became successively larger until the project featured more than a hundred sculptures. In addition to the housing complex, the sculptures were installed outside of the University of Tampa, the State Farm insurance agency in Tampa, a hospital in Tampa, and three locations in Clearwater. By the late 1990s, Fuss had seen the advent of the Internet and began making sculptures in response to architectural structures found online. In 1999, Fuss began posting photographs of his work online, which became a new method for him to display his sculptures for his audience. Between 2001 and 2006, Fuss created the current roof garden sculpture series, in response to the work of commercial web designers, including the work of Bruce Mau. By 2006, Fuss' work was being exhibited at international galleries. Development In September 2014, Fuss began taking photographs of the sculptures, which he hopes to exhibit online and in galleries. Fuss also began collecting photographs of past installations, which he hopes to display online. The photographs have been described as a record of local culture and as a site of nostalgia, hope, and resistance. Free The Roof Garden was named one of the Top Arts and Culture Blogs of 2014 by the Atlanta Journal-Constitution. The b7e8fdf5c8
