Testing included identification of color changes, detection of taste and recognition of shape for both taste and smell. Tactile detection thresholds were obtained by application of well-defined stimuli. Alcohol intoxication did not affect the sense of taste for any subject. In the group ingesting ethanol orally, correctly identified shapes ranged from 0.53 (0.56) with a high speed of presentation to 0.46 (0.58) with a slow speed of presentation. After recovering from the effects of alcohol, the same subjects showed improved recognition of shapes with a slow speed of presentation. When correctly identified shapes were used to determine the detection threshold for an electric shock delivered to the tongue, ethanol had no effect on either taste or touch. It is concluded that acute alcohol intoxication does not affect either the sense of smell or taste, but is associated with a loss of tactile detection threshold in the finger to a mechanical stimulus. It is suggested that the tactile loss is a result of alcohol consumption; other factors may also contribute.

For example, I might have: void methodA(myObj myObj); void methodB(myObj myObj); or more abstract: void methodA(object myObj); void methodB(object myObj); The object will probably get initialized somewhere in there, however, I don't always want to set all the values of myObj. I just want to get a value out of it. Method A is a snippet of a bigger method with quite a few parameters. It can get rather long to set all those parameters. If a user is just getting a value out of it, should I still initialize it? Or
