AM, at the Forêt de Rouffignac in France, a group of scientists lead by Dr. Paul Wignall, a palaeontologist, have a remarkable find.
These scientists discovered the fossilized remains of a new species of an extinct mammal that was a sort of cross between a moose and a rhinoceros, but far more intelligent than anything that lives today.
The scientists found an adult and a juvenile in the sediments of the locality, and they can at last say that these are the fossilized remains of a new species of this species, named the "wippler". When the scientists first discovered the remains, they were already present, well-preserved, and could be measured. They also found that the skull is big, and is slightly bent, which is a very unusual characteristic for the animal. This fact, when combined with the fact that the scientists didn't find any other remains of this animal, led to the idea that this animal was the remains of an adult animal that died between 7 and 11,000 years ago. Despite the age of the discovery, the scientists still don't know the sex of the animal, whether it is a male or a female. In addition to the discovery of a new species, the fossil also allowed the scientists to
