Many people in support of the so-called “traditional family” talk a lot about respect, integrity, responsibility, and accountability. In many ways, these are reasonable ideals for a family. A traditional family, consisting of a man and a woman together with their children, adheres to a set of relatively unambiguous cultural standards and expectations. Many of these expected standards are somewhat at odds with individual preferences. For instance, for a family, the mother and father should work to provide a stable, positive home environment for their children. Traditional relationships between parents and children, between husband and wife and the family unit, are expected to be mutual and to give children a sense of family stability and permanence. Similarly, children are expected to respect the parents and show respect for the family unit. The tensions involved in working so strongly in support of family values often come to blows in the political arena. Parental rights, family courts, custody, feminism, government services for youth and families, religious rights, private school and student family rights, religious freedom, adoption, and assisted reproductive technology have all become battlegrounds in recent years. Wade 43 years ago. Consider Alabama’s recent adoption ban where parents who attempt to adopt must also provide the name of a couple -whether they be a mother and father or two mothers or two fathers, - that would like to have the child adopted. These bans are not limited to the likes of Donald Trump, then-candidate of the Republican Party and holder of comparatively orthodox religious views, and Lou Dobbs, a conservative radio host from New York. Other politicians whom political correctness mortally wounds are
