more infodownloadThe overall objective of the S.M.D. Study is to document the effect of exposure to man-made and naturally occurring mixed solvents in animal species. An understanding of the toxicity and pharmacokinetics of man-made mixtures is necessary to understand their contribution to cancer and other toxicological diseases. The main objectives in the coming year shall be to complete the characterization of the clinical and histological toxicity of the chemical mixtures in rats, and to establish the bioassay and biochemical methods of measuring genotoxicity in mice. The research in the coming year will include the validation of the enzyme-linked immuno-sorbant technique for the detection and measurement of antibodies to toxapoetins in rats. This technique may have clinical utility for diagnosing exposure to organic solvents. The research will continue on the isolation, purification, and structure determination of p-n-octylphenol, and the assessment of its behavioral effects. The objectives include the isolation and identification of the major metabolites in pre- menopausal mouse urine and the development of an extraction and clean-up method to allow quantification of p-n-octylphenol in water. The metabolic fate of p-n-octylphenol will be studied in mice and rats. The hypothesis will be tested that phenolic glucuronides are the primary metabolites.
