The present invention relates to a conduit for use in binding a pair of split toe flaps of a lumber web and more particularly to such a conduit which includes a pair of conduit sections disposed on opposite sides of the web and defining a pair of elongated grooves within which the respective toe flaps of the web are received, wherein the sections are pivotally connected at intermediate portions thereof to allow their cooperation to be alternately opened for insertion of a lumber portion of the web through the grooves and closed for retention of the web to the sections. Various mechanisms have been developed for inserting a narrow web of lumber between a pair of split toe flaps of a lumber web, especially in the lumber industry. However, such mechanisms typically include a number of parts and are often quite complicated and expensive to fabricate and assemble. It would be desirable to provide a simple and effective means for binding a pair of split toe flaps of a lumber web together without the need for a number of complicated parts and manual assembly. It is therefore an object of the present invention to provide a single piece, manually operable conduit for use in binding a pair of split toe flaps of a lumber web together which is simple and inexpensive to fabricate and assemble. These and other objects are accomplished by providing a conduit having a pair of adjoining, U-shaped conduit sections which are pivotally connected to each other at respective intermediate portions thereof to allow
