Fair Trade: Beyond Barter How do free trade agreements and alternative currencies influence working relationships? A few years back there was much talk about worker rights and fair trade but most job related environmental campaigns were talking about the problems of global warming. Fair Trade and eco-friendly activity seem to go together in the minds of consumers. I'm here to talk about something else, I'm here to talk about the way that global trade and environmental practices are combining to change the way that we view working relationships. I see example after example of free trade producing alternatives for local production. I'm assuming that as the world community becomes more aware of the production chain and the correlation of prices, they will spend more time and effort ensuring that workers receive fair pay for their work. I'm sure that there are industries that don't seek fair trade as valid alternatives, and as a result, end up accepting unfair terms with the motive being tied to a major corporation and not to a concern for trade issues. Also, I don't want to discount off the fact that the effort to making these relationships more viable can be a very expensive venture. Also, let's keep in mind that fair trade has another option. If the value of the cash is not enough to keep the workers fairly employed, then they might choose to either make a choice to travel to another country where fair trade is more prevalent or go back to their own land where they own the land - this can be seen in Bolivia and Nicaragua. The biggest concern however, is that free trade will provide great opportunity for a massive increase in underground economies. In Brazil, where I come from, most people are employed by only one business, whereas in the US people are employed by many different businesses. In general, in the US there is a lot of outsourcing which is a different issue. It is possible that we could see the number of jobs tripled by 2025 according to the US government.
