Now when a client downloads the website

he gets an.ttf file which he then downloads in his IE. He then doesn't have the font I had chosen on the site. How do I make sure that the client only has the fonts in his IE? Do I have to configure the IE to only download the fonts he should have?

A: Simply putting the font files in a directory will make them available on the machine. In the case of Visual Studio, there are ways to do it in the project settings, but if they are installed system-wide (like the Windows Fonts directory on Windows or the Fonts directory on a Mac), then anything in those directories will be usable. If you have web fonts, there is a setting that allows IE to use them. At the bottom of the IE "Web Page Properties" dialog, there is a section titled "Accessibility and Content". In that section, there is a setting to "Allow pages to choose their own fonts". If this is selected, then all page content will choose fonts instead of the fonts specified in the page itself. IE will then download a text file, which it then uses to choose fonts. This file is stored somewhere in your web server's font directory. This will make IE replace any fonts specified in a page with fonts downloaded from that directory. The first option is probably more flexible, as it doesn't make your client specify the fonts he wants to use, but only make the site's fonts
