“HyperMotion Technology is a breakthrough for FIFA,” said Oliver Bierhoff, Creative Director at EA SPORTS. “This is the first time that we collect hundreds of thousands of data points across several categories and combine it into a gameplay engine that responds to your actions.” Working with the player data, Fifa 22 Activation Code sets new standards for the realism and accuracy of physical gameplay on console. Players’ running mechanics are now more in-line with what you would expect on the pitch, while player balance and reactions feel more realistic, with actions like sidestepping and defensive slides now fully powered by the technology. The following in-depth sections go into specific gameplay elements and the technology that powers them. Crouch-to-GK Depth New combo-based interactive movement commands have been added to turn certain player movements into balls that roll towards goalkeepers. These are triggered with new interactive commands within the context of realistic player movements. If a player runs towards a GK and doesn’t have the ball, they will pull the ball towards them with a “combo” command, letting the GK react to the movement and start diving to snuff out a cross. The player shown here has used the “combo” command to pull the ball towards him. The GK has correctly anticipated the direction and intercepted the ball. Reactions to Interceptions During a tackle, there is a gap between when the ball is received and when the defender initiates the initial contact. This allows players to pull the ball away from the defender, recover their balance and initiate an aerial duel with defenders. But if the opponent “pins” the ball to him or her or is otherwise in a position to stop a potential aerial pass, the defender is forced to choose between attempting to play the ball to teammates or simply trying to absorb the force of the tackle by going down. This is where the new crouch-to-GK technology comes into play. When a player manages to pull the ball away from the defender, he or she is presented with options: either playing the ball off the player that just hit them, or diving to try and stop the incoming pass. The player shown here is sliding towards the ground, in an attempt to gain time and space for an aerial pass. The red arrow shows the direction that the player is headed. R
