"Now, more than ever, they want to make the football special" Oculus Rift and HTC Vive "We are now creating the games for the next generation of football players," said Matt Prior, FIFA Lead Multiplayer Designer at EA. "Now, more than ever, they want to make the football special. They want to feel what it's like to be a football player and for that to come through in gameplay in FIFA. They want to be able to feel the hits, the tackles, the competition for the ball. This creates more tension and creates the key moments of football and makes the game much more fun and much more dramatic for players and spectators alike. This is why we have brought in the best motion capture studio in the world to help us make this happen." All EA Sports teams will be testing the new technology and it will be implemented into FIFA games as soon as possible. Andy Hayes and Andrew Crofts from Zinkin.com have also captured and performed a series of dummy run practices, and have showcased it in a documentary on Facebook: Like FIFA for a series of new cameras, The Camera.js, they have created a JavaScript library for motion capture that is available for all to use, that enables a player to use their webcam with the body sensors to capture a player's movements and perform the movements in real time with very simple setup. Time-of-Flight Imaging (TOF) is the latest sensor type, where it is used to provide a depth map to create a 3D reconstruction. It provides a metric of depth perception, like the height of each square in a chess board, but the details of the image are like those of an X-ray, but in a regular light. This technology is very accurate, while also being very easy to use. Players who want to perform their own motion capture tests will be able to do so with the Android-compatible MotionX. The device's depth sensor makes it very easy to create and perform 3D movements. 3D Depth Sensor The device can capture the tracking of the arm movements (with mouse pointer controls or a glove). The device is open source, meaning it is downloadable and can be used by anyone to build games and applications around the 3D sensor. There are also tools, such as React MotionX and Rebound MotionX, that make it very easy to

The EEA enables one of our biggest development hubs outside of the U.S. This is a perfect location for us to develop high-quality video games at a low cost, attracting developers worldwide who want to expand their portfolio by working on new, innovative titles in the fast-growing FIFA genre. In other words, by developing in the EEA, we become more competitive on the global stage. EA also uses the EEA to move games across all territories in a single release. This way, we can effectively test and improve games, have them out a few weeks faster, and make them available to all EA
