Impact of Resistance Training and Plank Exercise Training on 3-Month-Old Infant Gait Pattern. To investigate the effect of maternal-imprinted resistance training and plank exercise training on the gait pattern of 3-month-old infants. Nonrandomized clinical trial. A community-based weight-gain mother-infant laboratory. Forty primiparous overweight and obese women. Randomized to an 8-week resistance training (RT) program, a 8-week plank exercise (PL) program, or a waitlist (WL) control program. Body composition measured using dual-energy x-ray absorptiometry. Infant gait parameters calculated using a tri-axial accelerometer. Infants in the RT group had a significantly lower frequency of fall events (3.9 vs. 5.8 events/day) and a significantly lower frequency of fast events (2.8 vs. 4.3 events/day) compared with the WL group. Infants in the PL group had a significantly higher frequency of fast events compared with the WL group. There was a trend toward a lower mean cadence (mm/s) in the RT group compared with the PL group. In infants aged 3 months, maternal-imprinted resistance exercise may reduce the incidence of falls and may modify the spatiotemporal gait pattern, although further research is warranted. For similar reasons, maternal-imprinted plank exercise training may increase the incidence of fast events.
