A newly discovered substance from the same type of mushroom as the deadly drug heroin is showing early promise in helping people with depression. "I'm quite excited about this," said Dr. Charles Wooley, a researcher at Massachusetts General Hospital. "This is the first compound to come along in a long time, if you're talking about mood stabilizers." Mushrooms produce unusual substances that are new to science.

The type that contains beta-caryophyllene, a plant derivative, has been found to have activity against the yeast that causes gastrointestinal infections. The substance also inhibits the growth of the cystic fibrosis organism, Pseudomonas, and some fungi. Since beta-caryophyllene has been shown to be a painkiller, Dr. Wooley said, he started looking at its effects on people with depression.

The study was run at MassGeneral by scientists from Sanofi-Aventis, which is sponsoring it. It was published in the journal Biological Psychiatry and has been accepted for publication in a peer-reviewed journal. Twenty people suffering from severe depression were given beta-caryophyllene at a dose of 1,000 milligrams a day for eight weeks, along with an antidepressant called Fluoxetine. Those taking beta-caryophyllene also received sertraline, another antidepressant, in case the beta-caryophyllene had an effect. At the end of the eight weeks, most of the patients had a significant improvement in their symptoms. In 70 percent of them, the improvement was "better than the patients' current level of functioning," Dr. Wooley said. Dr. Wooley said the antidepressant sertraline was effective in this group of patients, but not as effective e79caf774b
