Please note that this service is no longer available for DCS World. It has been replaced with a new service "The" which you can find at DcS World Archive. Most flying simulators, like LFS and DCS World, support different icon formats and sizes and they use this information to load different interface elements at different points in the game. For example, LFS uses a

32x32 IconFormat and DCS World uses a 48x48 IconFormat. This is usually to make the screen a bit more compact, but it does not change the actual icon size. In DCS World, the default IconFormat is 48x48 pixels, which means all icons are about the same size. In the LFS World, the default IconFormat is 32x32, which means the icon size is bigger, but this also results in the icons being bigger, too. For more detailed information about how to apply IconFormats, please read the following article: Change the IconFormat in DCS World If you set the IconFormat to something different than 48x48 pixels

Our aim in this review is to demonstrate the usefulness of the alanine scanning method in protein engineering, particularly in obtaining information on the effect of single-residue substitution on the conformational stability and dynamics of globular proteins. Firstly, we describe the experimental design of an alanine scanning library based on the intrinsic distribution of amino acid residues in a protein. The method described has been optimized with different statistical analysis and selection methods for the selection of the most appropriate alanine in position X of a target protein. The library screening is performed on the basis of the intrinsic rate of unfolding of the protein in which the alanine is substituted, its resistance to chemical denaturants and the capacity to discriminate among the different test proteins. The structural information obtained in this way is useful in predicting the physiological role of the protein and in the selection of novel biomaterials. In conclusion, we demonstrate the application of the alanine scanning method to the structure-stability relationship of the the major antibiotic binding pocket of penicillin binding protein 4 (PBP4). Our results indicate that D76 of the beta-
