NEWS AND EVENTS Researchers Debate How To Use Risk in DUI Cuts November 7, 2012 a half dozen other motorists whizzed by my car. The trooper stopped and told me to step out of my car and meet him in the middle of the road, which, as you might imagine, I did. Some motor vehicle crashes, the kind that earn headlines, are, in fact, avoidable. To address injury-causing crashes, DUI has been reduced substantially. But it can never become a zero-risk activity. One of the tasks of researchers is to continually gauge society's harm being done to themselves and others through behaviors that pose a risk for driver injuries. This study was noted on a recent TED Talk, which began with the question: "What are the social processes that lead people to drink and drive?" A few weeks ago for instance, a large military outpost, just outside of Atlanta, Georgia was re-opened after four years of closure. Freedom Camp is the new name. The U.S. Army reopened the 68,000-acre camp, the largest camp in the area, with many stating that a more positive atmosphere and a dramatic reduction in drunken driving may be among the reasons for its re-opening. The increased traffic that volunteers reported during the reopening meant a lot of boozing. In 2006, around mid-December, six people died from alcohol-related crashes that shut down part of the camp. A year later, in 2007, seven people died on Interstate 285, which runs through the camp. South Carolina Highway Patrol Major Scott Pribble said of the incident: "Some of the fatalities may have been due to drinking; however some were related to the trucking operation." It was not until 2009 that the DUI monitoring program started and every September, while the camp was closed, a team of counselors checked in with applicants. The program is the same as the one that runs the RIDE program in South Carolina, meaning that people who are caught driving under the influence are not allowed to continue driving in South Carolina forever. At every roadside breath test for alcohol, counselors ask drivers if they have been drinking, and if they deny it, they conduct a more
