Republicans aren't so much in the mood to stop the Senate from voting on the Graham-Cassidy health bill as they are eager to ensure that Mitch McConnell doesn't have to break his promise of not bringing it up for a vote, because the bill starts to die the day that the Senate casts its first roll call vote. Right up until that vote, Republicans are talking about all of the things that are in the bill, from very modest, predictable items to the really dramatic things in the bill, like privatization of Medicare. This all sounds good to Republicans, and they want to filibuster in an attempt to deprive Democrats of the pretext for voting in favor. But they are trying to keep their objections going even as the votes are cast. As of now, the Washington Post has reported on five Republican senators who oppose Graham-Cassidy, and two of them have already publicly stated that they're going to vote against it. [S]ome Senate Republicans have dug in against a proposal backed by the party's presidential nominee that would overhaul the federal health care system. Even as Donald Trump has expressed support for the plan, Senate Republicans say they oppose its changes to Medicaid and insurance subsidies. Five of the 12 GOP senators said they couldn't support the bill as it stands. One of the Republican senators who has publicly said he would vote "no" is Susan Collins of Maine. Another is Lisa Murkowski of Alaska. That seems to be all the GOP members of the Senate who have come out in favor of the bill.
