P-type ATPases are ubiquitous membrane-embedded ion pumps that transfer Na+, K+, or Ca<sup>2+</sup> ions across the membrane against a concentration gradient. Due to their ion-translocating activities, P-type ATPases are involved in energy production and homeostasis in the cytoplasm and intracellular compartments. They are also involved in metal homeostasis in the secretory pathway and at the plasma membrane. In particular, P-type ATPases are believed to play an important role in metal detoxification in humans. Structurally, they resemble bacterial Na+/K+ ATPases, although they often possess novel, unique domains. Here, we discuss the different structures of P-type ATPases and their role in metal recognition by comparing the structures of mammalian Na+/K+ ATPases that mediate the cation:cation antiport for Na+/K+ transport in the secretory pathway with those that mediate metal transport in the body.Australia's Batemans River redfin minnow dies after fleeing immigration officers Published duration 14 June 2017 image copyright Getty Images image caption The fish was found at the foot of a dam in New South Wales An Australian redfin minnow that managed to escape from an immigration office has been found dead at the bottom of a dam.
