The Italian authorities have sent plane to India after it was suspected that a person travelling on the flight was carrying the virus. According to an Italian ministry report, the two had travelled together and the woman had developed fever on February 28 but it had been dismissed. Italy's federal police said on Sunday they had "definitive proof" a coronavirus patient had travelled via Rome to India, and sought to trace all the passengers of a second international flight that left Brussels after the first. "We have now positive proof on the Italian and the Belgian side that the the Asian country, which has reported the first COVID-19 case in its history, was the origin of the infection", Italian police said in a statement. They added that they were "tracing relatives" who had left the Brussels airport on a second plane that also carried passengers from India. The first plane had landed in Brussels at 10.26pm local time on Saturday (18.26 GMT) and the second at about 2am local time on Sunday (03.26 GMT) following different routes and destinations. The statement said "definitive proof" of the first case had been achieved through a search of the "ancient record" of the airline the first victim had travelled with, Leonardo Express. It said: "No trace of her was found, neither on the ticket nor on any data from the database of the airline, that is very common in this type of cases". The woman, a 44-year-old from Milan, is the latest patient of COVID-19 to be identified in Italy. She has been in hospital since her symptoms appeared after returning to the north of the country on February 25. The virus has killed nearly 2,000 people in China and killed more than 80 people in other countries. Another 22,000 cases have been confirmed worldwide, with 953 people having died, health officials said on Sunday. The latest person-to-person transmission outside of China was in Singapore on Monday, the World Health Organization said. A US citizen in his 50s had been treated and was recovering at a hospital. He had no travel history to China and no "known exposures" during his brief visit to the country, the federal government said. Last week, the WHO said the coronavirus was spreading in the US as well, but that there had been no new cases for two days. The UN agency said
