According to equations, magnitude of the displacement due to gravity is equal to vector of the gravitational force multiplied by the distance moved. Why is the magnitude of the velocity component parallel to the displacement? A: Velocity always has a magnitude and a direction. There's no way to define a vector without a direction (so the magnitude of a vector is meaningless). The direction of velocity is perpendicular to the displacement and the magnitude of velocity is equal to the magnitude of the displacement. However, you can't actually say that the velocity of an object is "parallel" to the displacement it makes, since displacement is a vector quantity, not a scalar. You can say that the direction of the velocity is parallel to the displacement (which is the direction of the gravitational force), but not that the velocity is parallel to the displacement itself. PCB: New technology has a vital role to play in improving industrial competitiveness The National Policy for Industrial Competitiveness 2015-2020 has been
