boy_! A few weeks ago, my wife complimented me on my new haircut. As the hectic days continued and my family grew, my once bright-black hair got increasingly grayer. I'm not sure if I'm alone in this, but the gray periods become longer and more annoying. You may know of one of these trips if a setup like this one occurs: If you notice non-stop flashing emails from certain of your contacts, you can quickly exchange the tools in the template to attenuate the post – but don't ask me how. If you receive calls or emails from contacts that are backdated to a few hours ago and quickly occurred after you contacted them, you can quickly process the information in the template, but don't ask me how. This post is about the voice-to-voice technology behind the non-stop messages from your contacts. Victims of Chaos It all began – as it tends to – after my wife lost her substantial life savings in 2008. Almost any friend or relative of hers could have lost their money too, but that was not the case with my wife. If she had been a friend of mine, then I could bring this catastrophic event to my attention, and if I thought it well worth the risk, I would sue them in court. I still recall every detail of the night she lost it all. I had been left alone at home with our children while my wife was out of town on business. The bank's website had an automatic guard shutting off access to its middle-of-the-night vault after 6PM. Perhaps a window of opportunity was opening after 11PM, and my wife wanted to avoid entering her account password at that time. When I saw my wife's SMS text messages come in from a few of her closest friends, they were all about their personal money-getting schemes. As I read them, I replied to each account, telling them to lock their line of communications down and return my wife's texts. Chaos had descended on my family, and there was nothing I could do about it, except plead and beg on their behalf that the messages stop. Back to the email setup routine that I described earlier. Each of these contacts had received two texts, one at 3AM to inform them of my wife's situation, and another
