- Wine & Spirits Today marks the arrival of the seventh generation of Microsoft's ubiquitous software suite. After years of neglect, the standard software has a new name, a new logo, a new touch experience, and a new look. As with previous generations, Windows 10 will have a number of features designed to take the touch experience to the next level. One of those features is Windows Ink, a new way to perform touchscreen tasks with a pen. Windows Ink first appeared in Windows 8.1. That version offered a number of ways to use the pen. One of the simplest was to jot down notes on an imaginary notepad. Windows Ink's new first-party features now make this same functionality more accessible. Microsoft has a new quick-swipe gestures that mirror a pen's trajectory to create your strokes. For developers, this feature offers a novel use of touch-based controls. In the past, apps that used that technology typically required a device with a stylus. Microsoft hasn't added that restriction to this new version of Windows, which means that almost any device that is compatible with Windows 10 will now be able to run Windows Ink-enabled apps. In Windows 10, this feature is designed for handwritten notes as much as it is for the more typical tasks like drawing and drawing diagrams, even if the latter are still coming to the new OS on a slow and uneven pace. The new version of Windows 10 came with a redesigned Start screen that offers a new multitasking interface. Alongside this, there is a number of new features on the desktop like a new universal apps store, the ability to run multiple instances of apps at the same time, a clipboard history, and new ways to interact with some of the more common file types. This is all designed with the multi-purpose pen at the center. Windows Ink features In Windows 10, there are two main ways to use the pen. One of the simplest ways is to jot down notes and sketches. The other main usage is to take advantage of Windows' built-in intelligence to convert your handwritten notes into editable text. Both of these types of functions are designed around pen and paper. Microsoft has created a number of different gestures designed to make that easier to do on Windows. The use of daily diary data allowed researchers to examine psychological and health outcomes over a longer period of time than those obtained in a cross-sectional design. After 3 months, the researchers found that in contrast to the control group, individuals with a high level of interdependence reported more affiliative and supportive relationships, had higher self-esteem and were less depressed at the end of the study period. They also had lower levels of anxiety and perceived greater physical health than members of the control group. Additionally, interdependent individuals were more adept at problem-solving. The findings were published in the Journal of Personality and Social Psychology. “Contrary to our expectations,
