of putting implementation files
in the same dir, inside the src dir? I'm usually creating a new Maven module, with src, test, and resources dirs:

src/main/java src/test/java src/main/resources

Recently I needed to write a Maven module that contains implementation files as well, so I decided to add a `src/main/java/org/sometype/app` package, and put all my implementation files inside it. The question I have is: What is the purpose of putting the implementation files in the same dir, as the regular source files? The only thing I've come up with is that it reduces the size of the classpath when a developer compiles your implementation files, but I haven't found any evidence for that. A: I see at least the following reasons why one may want to separate implementation from sources.

A module could have other modules as dependencies, and the same applies to their implementations. This applies to non-zero-based Java modular dependency management. That is, if your module A depends on B, then if B contains its implementation classes, then A must contain B's implementation classes. If A depends on B, then it needs B's implementation classes, but not vice versa. Let's look at an example, the module has the pom.xml A B -> D D contains B. B implements D. D, in source or in binary form, it's not of great importance, a developer may have it in the source code and it will be delivered for compile, or it might be in binary form in the war/ear. A contains B.B, and knows that B has D.D, it needs D.D's implementation classes, but does not need to deliver the implementation classes for D.D. C -> E -> F G -> I I needs H and J (implementation classes for H and J), but does not need D.D. In 648931e174
