To examine gender differences in self-assessment of well-being by the World Health Organization-Five Wellbeing Index (WHO-5) and to determine what sociodemographic characteristics might account for any gender difference. Using data collected through the World Health Organization Study of Global AGEing and Adult Health, the 2005 WHO-5 data were analyzed separately for men and women (N = 35,891). The well-being index is a brief five-item selfrating measure of positive and negative psychological well-being ranging from 0 to 100, with higher scores indicating a better sense of well-being. Among the ten most common individual items, five were gender-specific. For men, "having a happy life" was their most frequently reported "moderately" or "very" item while for women it was "feeling useful." Men were twice as likely as women to report that they felt "very happy." Men were more likely to rate themselves lower in "poor self-esteem." Age and education significantly reduced the gender gap on the well-being index. Social class and ethnicity were correlated with the well-being index for both men and women, but the magnitude of these correlations were smaller than age. The well-being index is able to detect gender differences in selfassessed well-being. Interventions designed to improve health for older men should take this effect into consideration.
