Although it appears that the MRI findings may help to determine the risk of rupture in these patients, this is not so well established and there is no one data that has come forth on this issue. In a study of 21 patients with unruptured or ruptured aneurysms, those with a large aneurysm with a fusiform morphology were associated with a greater risk of rupture when compared with those with a wide-necked aneurysm. In another study, patients with aneurysms involving the terminal bifurcation, wide necked fusiform aneurysms, and focal areas of wall thinning were at a higher risk for rupture. In our patient, the most important imaging finding was a large unruptured aneurysm, with the risk of rupture being high. Although the approach for the aneurysm was complicated by the location and size, the direct impression of the surgeon was that it was a fusiform aneurysm, extending to the posterior wall of the truncus of the middle cerebral artery. CONCLUSION {#sec1-4} ===== Bilateral cervical LMCA originating from the truncus of the MCA is very rare. The aneurysm was successfully occluded with an ACP with good outcome.
