Arrhythmia can be caused by improper electrical signals to the heart. Arrhythmia may be classified by the abnormal rhythm of the heartbeat as either bradycardia or tachycardia. The terms tachycardia and bradycardia are generally used interchangeably. Bradycardia can be defined as an abnormally slow heartbeat that is insufficient to supply enough oxygen to the body. Tachycardia, on the other hand, can be defined as an abnormally rapid heartbeat that is too rapid to supply enough oxygen to the body. Tachycardia is generally the result of an irregular heartbeat caused by abnormal electrical signals. A normal heart typically has a heartbeat between about 60 and 100 beats per minute. If the heart's electrical conduction system becomes impaired, the heartbeat may become too rapid for the heart to supply enough oxygen to meet the body's metabolic needs. Heart attacks are a common source of bradycardia. This type of bradycardia is usually the result of disruption or destruction of a portion of the heart's conduction system, which may be caused by a build-up of scar tissue on a ventricular wall, a blood clot in the ventricular chambers, a blood clot in the arteries that supply the heart (e.g., the coronary arteries), or other conditions. Tachycardia, which also may be caused by a conduction system disruption or cardiac disease, may result from
