Windows XP and earlier. Windows 10 has recently been released, and with it one of the most significant improvements ever. In the world of network architecture, Windows 10 is a significant step in the right direction; in fact, it's the first major version to carry the Intel Multi-Gigabit Ethernet standard, according to the company itself. That wasn't all: not only does Windows 10 include many new features, like Windows Ink, which allows you to do more with your computer by sketching and tracing, but it also gains a lot from the technical point of view. First and foremost, the new OS is compatible with all devices that were launched since Windows 7, but which didn't support any of the abovementioned standards. So not only do you receive better graphics, but also much better compatibility. Additionally, the operating system includes the benefits of multiple processors, both for every app and for the kernel. The new architecture also allows various other features such as Windows Hello, which manages biometric data to gain access to the computer's system. Furthermore, the operating system gains the ability to run on multiple screens. Finally, it removes the need for updates, because it is capable of detecting compatibility issues while it runs. But one of the greatest changes in the network architecture is that Windows 10 keeps compatibility with older versions: the latest installer informs users about that before they decide to install the operating system. However, that doesn't mean that those who have already installed Windows 7 or 8 will need to do another upgrade; on the contrary, they will receive an automatic update. Now, the advantage Windows 10 has over its predecessors is that it is much more stable than its predecessors, thanks to a much better and more efficient kernel.

WinMatrix was the first application I got to review here in this website (just a few days ago). People are really interested in such a good desktop customization application. Because of its high performance, the app has many users all over the world, and it will continue to get more and more as time goes by. Best part of this free application is that it allows customizing the desktop background in three different types of view, where one can animate the texts. The frames of the texts can be settled either by single line, or by full, half, first and half frame. In order to save the settings, users have to click on the save button at the bottom of the application. People are really looking forward to updating of new features in this app, and I am sure that they will have it.
