Precise tumour localisation is important to spare the normal tissue around tumour and improve outcome. This study aimed to evaluate the usefulness of radioguided occult tumour localisation (ROLL) for colorectal cancer (CRC). We retrospectively analysed the usefulness of radioguided occult tumour localisation for CRC patients, who underwent colorectal resection at University Hospital, Rijeka, between April 2011 and March 2014. Each patient was examined preoperatively by the scan described in the method. We recorded the number of the detected tumours by using the radioguided approach, the number of the detected occult tumours by performing surgery and postoperative histopathological examination, local recurrence, and the postoperative outcome. We evaluated the amount of bowel resection (per cent of the bowel) and the tumour invasion. Fifty-six patients with CRC were examined. The tumour was detected by the scan in 43 patients (sensitivity = 77.1%). Ten patients (sensitivity = 17.9%) had their resection on the basis of radioguided approach. By performing surgery, 19 patients (sensitivity = 32.8%) with CRC were found. The sensitivity of the approach was 88.1%

(19/21). The respective number of detected and occult tumours were 1 and 7 (spatial sensitivity = 50%). The specificity was 80%. By the end of the observation time, no local recurrence was recorded. The advantage of the radioguided approach is that it increases the spatial sensitivity. Furthermore, it decreases the amount of the bowel resection. Surgeons may find out the occult tumours that were not found by using the usual radiographic examinations. In addition, the approach may identify recurrent tumours, which may suggest that the time for salvage surgery is preferable for these patients.Q:
