In conscious, spinalized rats, the afferent inflow to the leg is reduced. However, there is persisting sensory-evoked potentials (SSEPs) on the ipsilateral and the contralateral side, which are probably related to the recruitment of subnuclei involved in the control of the spinal somatic reflexes. It is not clear if this persistent inflow on the ipsilateral side is the result of bilateral supraspinal influence or if it is related to the recurrent collaterals of the supraspinal axons activated by the spinal stimulus. In order to establish this, the left tibial nerve was isolated and stimulated electrically during prolonged monosynaptic reflexes evoked by the tibial nerve in the right hindlimb. It was found that the conditioning stimulation was responsible for the persistence of SSEPs on the ipsilateral side, due to a renewed recruitment of subnuclei, which in turn induced an increase in the already ongoing afferent activity. After neuromuscular blockade the conditioning stimulation had no effect. These results suggest that the persisting afferent inflow on the ipsilateral side is not due to bilateral activation of supraspinal structures, but rather due to the influx of afferent information from the contralateral side and to the recruitment of the ipsilateral reticulospinal neurons.Men demand gender-neutral restrooms at Texas funeral home Mesquite, Texas residents discovered quite the fight with
