Like it or not, collision detection (or how to make invisible objects in a game and create dynamic objects) is one of the main challenges of game development. And also, it is no less than the other problem of designing worlds, such as lighting, environment design, etc. The incorrect detection of collision between objects may lead to inconclusive effects, including the wrong movement of objects in a game. But with our collision technology, users can build a huge number of in-game objects without worrying about the performance of the game. Now users need to just make the objects invisible, or make the objects move like they are not there. Guaranteed Tackles is a face recognition app for the Xbox One. To get to the first level you have to play the game. It is pretty hard to get past Level 2 even, as your controls are a little off. It's a pretty basic app, but I found it extremely frustrating. To the developer: If you want to give the app a try, try to find a way to get something in the game that doesn't just go in circles and stay in place. Many of the levels are very frustrating because the game has no real control and just keeps moving in the same direction.
