Q: Avoid writing redundant "Foo" when using fluent interfaces Consider the following code which represents something like a frame (a window or tab) inside a wpf application: `public class MyFrame : Frame { public MyFrame() { SetProperty(App.ModalityProperty, Modality.Transient); SetProperty(App.VisibilityProperty, Visibility.Collapsed); } }` This is just a dummy example, the real code deals with many other properties. The SetProperty method is defined as `public static bool SetProperty(DependencyProperty property, DependencyProperty values)` and has three values: Modality, Visibility, and VisibilityChanged I am writing a short tutorial for students in which I want to tell them "this is how you can encapsulate these properties using a fluent interface" The problem is that "Foo" is written redundantly. As I understand the fluent methods in object oriented languages, they make you write the same code once for the `if(isFoo)` and once again for the `setFoo(bar)`. The second code only differs in the `isFoo` part. How do you write this code without writing "Foo" twice? A: Since you say that SetProperty also has three parameters, why not use the curiously recurring template pattern (or Builder pattern?) and use named parameters: `bool SetProperty(TProp, string Modality, string Visibility, Action notificationChanged)`; This is a pseudo-code, so you need to figure out the proper implementation of TProp. The long-term objectives of the research are to discover pathways that can be targeted by pharmaceutical agents to treat drug abuse. The main focus is on dopamine transmission and its underlying mechanisms in the brain. Dopamine plays a critical role in modulating the rewarding properties of drugs of abuse. Neuroadaptations of dopamine transmission contribute to the transition from recreational drug use to compulsive drug use and addiction. The mechanisms of D2 receptor signaling are well characterized. In contrast, the mechanisms by which dopamine receptors act
