What's new in Hex Defense:

Undoubtedly it was not befitting that I should choose to spend the beginning of my career in the Quantock Hills among simple and kindly folk, just as I had resolved to get my pension on becoming an officer. Reopened after fifty years But unfortunately my desire to recover my rightful place in the civil service coincided with a rash of popularity among the farmers, driven by that considerable force the squire of the parish. Who knew more, or used more thoroughly the common people in Quantock, than Old Doc Parcher, the sexton, the local butcher and notary? While a Member of Parliament he had built an enormous steam-engine, as huge as an elephant's and a fitter thing too. He built walls around the gardens of his estate, and new rooms for his daughters. And through all his successes he was the soul of charity, coming off with a pair of shoes for half a dozen neighbors without a heel and a new lad At his wake, a great crowd of poor had gathered to drink cheap calvados in large glasses as his coffin was taken home, accompanied by that volley of shouts that is the inevitable accompaniment of the death of any man who has succeded to an eminent position in the affections of the masses. This was, at least according to the tale, my second chance to "put the squire's nose out of joint." All over the country, all those men counted it their duty to contribute to the causes of right and justice with the last month's supply of money. Now, as I had heard, the pastor of one of the worst slums in the town had claimed that the boy would be received into the parish on the spot. The old pastor was quite pleased about it. They agreed to enter me in the apprentice register and sent me off to the pastor for further instructions. Old Doc Parcher, the sexton, a great friend of mine, and the butcher again let me know that I need not bother about right and wrong, since I had made my mark with him in St. Mary's churchyard as his assistant. Moreover, it was his advice that I should become an apprentice to the priest and work at his own price. "

The "Red Star" is one of the surviving warships that escaped from the Espionage Operation in 1991. Taking advantage of its superior navigational skills, it was allowed to dock near its destination, the Earth. After landing on the planet, the Red Star exchanged messages with its employers. However, no one on the ship could have guessed the things that would happen afterwards. Armed with more advanced technology than anyone had dreamed of, the Red Star's crew unleashed a ruthless plan to conquer the world. The United Nations Army (UN) stopped the invaders with its highly advanced weaponry, but in the end, Earth was doomed to lose the war. The people on Earth were forced to live underground, where society collapsed into civil war. The UN declared the Red Star the sole enemy and set out to destroy it. The war that lasted for the next 100 years was fought by two opposing fleets on the far side of the solar system. The era of chaos and destruction quickly turned into a struggle between a world of peace and prosperity, and another world of death and destruction. Over a period of 100 years, humanity lost its way, split into two camps, and humanity as we know it disappeared into the void. At that time, another fleet arrived outside the Earth's solar system. It was a fleet that claimed to be the same people who had occupied the Red Star in 1991. They said they were searching for the rest of the people who had escaped from the First Fleet. However, over the course of the last century, the Second Fleet had changed greatly. It no longer resembled the fleet that had occupied the Red Star in 1991. "You're the red star," the Second Fleet said. "And we need you. You're the only one we can trust." The Earth's indigenous population and the Second Fleet agreed on a plan to send an expedition to the Red Star. Both humanity and the Second Fleet were confident that they could do whatever they wanted in this new world. However, for the Earth, the end of the war would be the end of existence as we know it. A new world was waiting for humans to occupy. Before the Earth leaves, we will set off on a long journey. The End? Because of the time travel, the episode changed greatly from what happened in reality. Characters: Suiko A young girl who is 21 years old at the time of the story. She is the captain of the Earth's fleet. She and everyone who comes in contact with her seems
