Field of the Invention The present invention relates generally to the filling of a leak in a pipe. More particularly, the invention relates to a method of plugging a leak in a pipe. 2. Description of the Prior Art Pipes such as the leg of a water cooler are often filled with water or ice when they are installed. The pipe is typically welded closed but a leak can occur if the weld is faulty. A leak can also occur if the pipe is bent or the material around the pipe is cracked or damaged, and the pipe is not thick enough to withstand significant bending. The pipe is typically either left to heal on its own or a repair technique is used to repair the leak. Repairing a leak in a pipe may involve recapping the pipe or plugging the hole with a suitable material. Where a leak is found, a hole is typically punched in the pipe to allow the plugging material to enter the pipe. If the pipe is recapped, the hole is typically made in the pipe at an angle such that the recapping material does not go through the hole. Alternatively, a patch may be taped around the hole after the patch material is inserted. When a hole is punched in a pipe, stress often builds up in the inner wall of the pipe. Sometimes, after the hole is punched, a fracture occurs in the pipe due to the stress.

Microtubules are an important component of the cytoskeleton of animal cells. They are involved in cell shape determination, intracellular transport, and division. Microtubules are formed in the cell by polymerization of a combination of tubulin (alpha-tubulin and beta-tubulin) subunits; it is, therefore, a combination of tubulin subunits, rather than a single polymerized molecule, which forms the microtubule. Microtubules may be divided into two basic categories based on their behavior in vivo: stable
