Pulmonary fibrosis is a common lung disease associated with a high mortality rate. Epigallocatechin gallate (EGCG), the most abundant polyphenolic compound in green tea (Camellia sinensis), possesses antioxidant, anticancer, and anti-inflammatory properties. We examined the effect of EGCG on the development of pulmonary fibrosis induced by intratracheal instillation of bleomycin in mice. Animals were injected intratracheally with bleomycin at 7 U/kg of body weight. EGCG at 2.5 and 5 mg/kg was administered intraperitoneally daily for 3 weeks, starting on the same day that bleomycin was instilled. Lung injury induced by intratracheal bleomycin instillation was significantly alleviated by EGCG treatment. In addition, EGCG reduced the expression of fibronectin and alpha-smooth muscle actin in the lungs. The mitogen-activated protein kinases Erk1/2 and p38 were activated by the intratracheal instillation of bleomycin. The phosphorylation levels of these enzymes were reduced by EGCG treatment. Treatment with EGCG significantly reduced the number of macrophages and neutrophils in the lungs of bleomycin-treated mice. Furthermore, EGCG reduced the expression of TNF-alpha, MMP-9, IL-6, and inducible NO synthase induced by bleomycin. These results suggest that EGCG attenuates the development of pulmonary fibrosis by suppressing the activation of inflammatory cells. "One of them came to our town." "Of course." "That's how all this started." "Maybe it's better this way." "Maybe they're still out there." "Maybe all four of them are." "They have to
