Remember back when Apple unveiled new iPhones and they came with some new features and everything seemed cool? It was before the next iPhone was released and everything felt bad and disappointing. Last month Apple held a widely attended event at its California campus, with Steve Jobs onstage at the helm, to unveil iPhone 6 and 6 Plus. The new phones had some cool features, but the biggest was the 4.7 inch screen. Many people thought it was big enough for a tablet. But Apple announced that it would be an actual phone and not a "bigger iPhone." As Consumerist observes: Apple said the new phone was designed from the ground up to change the way people think about their devices, and that one of the key things it's done is make the screen the biggest part of the device, not the bezel. Thus, the new device's screens are significantly larger than the previous iPhone, and significantly larger than any mobile phone on the market. It did feel slightly awkward when suddenly other tablets seemed to suddenly seem smaller. I was looking at an iPad a few days before the event, and I remember thinking to myself: "this is nice and all, but it's a little small." A few months later the new Google Nexus 10 was announced, and it's absolutely huge. But wait a second, aren't the 4.7 inch screens even bigger now than the iPad? Isn't that a good thing? I'm only thinking about it because I've been using an iPhone 5s, which has a screen like the old 4-inch iPhone. But looking at the new iPhone 6 and 6 Plus, it looks much larger. That's a good thing! Except...those are just screens. The bezel around the screen is bigger than that of previous iPhones, and that's not always a good thing, even if it's "for now" until they

Lung endothelium-derived vasoconstrictor is mediated by an endothelial nitric oxide synthase-dependent mechanism but not a superoxide-dependent mechanism. Lung vascular smooth muscle has been shown to express endothelial nitric oxide synthase (eNOS) and to be responsive to endothelium-derived nitric oxide (EDNO). However, it is not known whether eNOS-derived EDNO mediates vascular smooth muscle relaxation in the lung. In this study, we examined the role of EDNO in the regulation of pulmonary vascular tone by evaluating the vasodilation caused by airway infusion of the eNOS substrate L-arginine. Studies were performed in urethane-anesthetized, vagotomized, and mechanically ventilated rabbits. In the upper airways, L-arginine (0.5, 2.0, and 5.0 mg/kg, i.v.) dose dependently decreased the mean pulmonary arterial pressure (mPAP) to a maximum of 41%, whereas L-NNA (1.0 mg/kg, i.v.), a nitric oxide synthase (NOS) inhibitor, did not significantly decrease mPAP (control mPAP
