I am using the Bullet Physics library (libbullet) to create a simple 2D game. I just implemented a game loop that refreshes the display and obtains user input, but I still am wondering if I did the right thing. According to the documentation, in order to use bullet, I have to add all the files from the library's folder to my compile string. I did that, and the program works fine when running the compiled code. However, as the game files are updated and new files are added to the library, the bullet physics in my code does not reflect the new files (as if I compiled the same code without the new files) even though I do not recompile. I am pretty sure this is something trivial to do, but I have not been able to figure out why my files are not being "merged" with the new files from the Bullet Physics library. As an example, I added a new file named world.cpp in the program folder, while the world.h and world.inl files are in the Bullet Physics library's directory. The behavior is basically the same. A: I think I found the answer, and I thought I'd share it for future reference. I never compiled my code using g++ -o program program.cpp On Windows, the program file created by this command always had a different name (program.exe or something) than the original filename program.cpp. In other words, the compiled program was always executable, and the linker basically ignored everything in program.cpp that was not in the compiled program.
