But if you have the interest, the patience, and the amount of time on your hands, this game is for you! This is a game that's been made with love, and it shows." "Far more challenging than your typical RPG, but in a good way. While the graphics aren't anything to write home about, the environments and the characters are both outstanding. More importantly is that the combat system has a great feel of finesse to it, and more importantly, a very hard core difficulty curve. If you're looking for an RPG with a truly great story, then the Elden Ring is the one." "The game has excellent controls and a detailed and dynamic battle system. A terrifically well-polished game. The audio and visual presentation is wonderful. If you've ever wondered what it would be like to travel through a fantasy world to become a legendary dragon slayer, then this game is for you. The game is a great story, with great action and visuals. It's a fantastic game." "The art direction of this game is very nice, not only the basic art, but the effects, the armor, the whole environment. The controls are clearly for the intermediate to advanced player. I want to accept a multi-line input in main function, and do some operations on it. I tried std::string str; std::cin >> str; But this did not work for me, and even when I use it with std::getline(std::cin, str);, it does not work either. A: Passing std::cin to a function is not a good idea. You should get input from std::cin using the std::getline() function. Also, you can't use >> with std::cin. In fact, that's what I think you're trying to do, but you're actually trying to assign input to a std::string variable. The command line is not specified in a way that makes sense for a std::string, so there's no point in trying to convert it to one. Instead, you should use getline() in a loop over the input line, and use char values from it to parse it. E.g., #include #include #include #include int main() { std::vector lines; while (std::getline(std::cin, lines)) { std::string line; std::stringstream line_stream(lines); std::string var; std::getline(line_stream, var); lines.erase(std::remove(lines.begin(), lines
