(Ronen Zvulun/AP) The Obama administration will propose changes to its longstanding Middle East peace process this week as part of a document meant to lay the groundwork for its final status negotiations with the Palestinian Authority. [Obama sends message to Netanyahu about future of Mideast peace process] In a speech in which he will lay out a “framework” for the talks, the president is expected to describe a “two-state solution” in which Israel would retain permanent borders and a capital in East Jerusalem. At the same time, the speech is expected to underscore the centrality of the issue of Israeli settlements — a small population center in the West Bank that Israeli leaders have said must remain part of Israel for any peace deal to succeed. When President Obama talked about the two-state solution, he was referring to the “1967 borders” that existed between Israel and the rest of the
