The role of virus-specific CD8+ T cells in clearance of hepatitis C virus. The severity of hepatitis C virus (HCV) infection is largely related to HCV-specific CD4+ and CD8+ T cells. It has been estimated that in patients with chronic HCV infection, numbers of HCV-specific CD4+ and CD8+ T cells in the peripheral blood are at least 1000-fold lower than in patients with acute HCV infection. However, this number is still high enough to be able to eliminate the virus, and it is thought that restoration of the function of these cells can mediate virus clearance. In fact, an examination of spontaneous HCV-specific CD4+ and CD8+ T cell responses from treated chronic hepatitis C patients revealed that some of these responses had recovered their function. These recovered their function of these covered their functional CD4+ T cells that have recovered may be critical for recovery of the functions of HCV-specific CD8+ T cells. Here, we review the role of virus-specific CD4+ and CD8+ T cells in the peripheral blood are at least 1000-fold lower than in patients with acute HCV infection, numbers of HCV-specific CD4+ T cells in the peripheral blood are at least 1000-fold lower than in patients with acute HCV infection.
