In particular, the present invention relates to a device for automatically controlling the operation of a pressure reduction control valve which supplies a brake booster with reduced pressure. A vehicle equipped with a brake booster, as is well known, is provided with a vacuum generating source such as an engine and a large-diameter vacuum chamber which communicates with the vacuum generating source. The vacuum chamber, together with a power source for driving a booster and a master cylinder, constitutes a so-called brake booster assembly. The brake booster, in response to a hydraulic pressure control signal, applies the output force of the master cylinder onto a wheel brake to hold the wheel brake in operation. The pressure reduction control valve is used to control the amount of pressure difference produced in a control passage which connects the master cylinder and the pressure chamber of the brake booster assembly. The pressure reduction control valve includes a pressure reducing valve which opens and closes the control passage to control the pressure difference between the pressure chamber and a reservoir. Brake boosters are adapted to produce a great pressure difference in the control passage for applying the wheel brake with a large output force. A large pressure difference, however, may cause a large difference in the pressure of a brake fluid. The pressure of the brake fluid, in many cases, is increased by the friction between the wheel and the road surface. The increased brake fluid may cause a hydroplaning phenomenon in which a part of the brake fluid flows on the ground surface to result in a riding deterioration. In order to avoid such a riding deterioration, the pressure of the brake fluid must be reduced to approximately 10 Kg/cm<sup>2</sup>. It is therefore necessary for a brake booster to adjust the pressure of the brake fluid which reaches the master cylinder while the vehicle is traveling. In a known pressure reduction control valve, the output force of the master cylinder, which acts on the brake booster, is controlled by a vacuum line which is provided between the vacuum source and the pressure chamber. The pressure of the brake fluid supplied into the pressure chamber is gradually reduced by way of the
