Botany Botany is the science of plant life, just like zoology studies the animals. Classes in botany are offered at the middle or high school level for general education and prepare students to take more advanced science classes in college. Students can earn credits towards graduation while studying this subject, and can enroll in advanced classes in college that will allow them to apply the ideas they've learned. Admission Requirements To take botany classes, you must meet the minimum Admissions Requirements listed in the requirements chart. While many schools offer you the option to earn high school credit for the classes, note that credit for these classes will need to be verified at the school.

Geography Geography is the study of landforms and processes that shape the Earth. Students have the opportunity to study them, work in community service organizations, and even study abroad to truly appreciate a geographical location. Geography also offers high school credit, but is not used often by students because it doesn't meet the exacting standards of other science courses. Admission Requirements To take geography classes, you must meet the minimum Admissions Requirements listed in the requirements chart. While many schools offer you the option to earn high school credit for the classes, note that credit for these classes will need to be verified at the school.

Astronomy Astronomy is the study of the natural objects that revolve around Earth. Students study objects as far away as stars and planets, with the understanding that we may someday live on a planet of our own. Because our knowledge in this area expands quickly, you must be careful when joining an astronomy club. It's easy to get caught up in the hype and have your expectations of a hobby, profession or other
