Moana - Young women of Pacific Northwestern Polynesian (Hindi speaking) culture expressed a strong desire to do the right thing, and to live according to the mores of their culture. The film combines at the outset a look at the origin of the idea with an operetta and ragtime style musical number, "You Are The Only One". In the earlier sequences, the princess is depicted as surfing along on her blue canoe and arriving at the island of Motunui (modern-day American Samoa) where her biological mother resides. When the mother finally emerges from the forest, she orders the daughter to steal the necklaces that she wears. The mother then explains to her daughter that Moana, as she is named, is the name of the sovereign of Motunui. She had been forced to leave her place of birth and seek out the master of the ocean, Maui. The climax of the film is the return to the island of Motunui, where Moana and Maui battle for Moana's heart, and the idea of doing the right thing, so that the people may be safe. Moana's character is meant to represent the unity that the Pacific Island people share when it comes to culture and traditions. Another character, the demigod Maui, serves as a modern-day embodiment of the tradition that the Polynesian cultures had about power and dominance. The character of Maui is not a perfect figure. Rather, he is the embodiment of the substance behind the traditional Polynesian names for gods, such as the name for the character of Maui: Makemake.
