Lymphangiomyomatosis (LAM) is an unusual disease characterized by proliferation of atypical smooth muscle cells within the lymphatic system. The diagnosis is usually based on histological sections of tissue, but the disease is highly suggestive when presenting with chylothorax or on transplant lung. The aim of the present study was to evaluate the validity of cytological findings in the diagnosis of LAM. Two clinical scenarios are presented, one in which cytology is used for the first time in diagnosis and the other in which the cytological findings are suggestive of LAM, but the histology report makes no mention of the LAM diagnosis. We studied 16 pleural effusions cytologically examined at a hospital in the south of Sweden. The cases represent two different scenarios where LAM was suspected based on clinical, radiological or cytological findings. Cytology results were retrospectively evaluated with the help of the histological diagnosis. The cytological findings included foamy macrophages in 13/16 and lymphocytes in 10/16 cases. However, the cytological findings could not be correlated to the histology and all patients with LAM had clear-cut histological changes. In conclusion, fine-needle aspiration cytology is of little use in the diagnosis of LAM. Don't let it happen again!" "Archery!" "The arrow flew directly towards Sinbad!" "He is hit!"
