In the wake of President Donald Trump's declaration that transgender people will no longer be allowed to serve in the military, the Pentagon announced Wednesday that transgender Americans can continue to serve openly, provided they no longer seek to be transitioned into a different gender. Transgender people are identified as having a gender identity outside the traditional two-sex binary. According to the announcement, transgender Americans may continue to serve and be served in the same way as they have in the past, though the prohibition on attempting to "induce or encourage" those with gender dysphoria to change their gender will remain in place. That, however, means that doctors who have sought to help transgender people transition to a different gender will not be covered by the military's insurance policy. But the declaration reverses a policy announced by President Barack Obama in 2016, which said transgender people would be permitted to serve openly. Transgender people began coming out in large numbers following that announcement, and advocates say that LGBT members of the military are currently serving in greater numbers than before. "This announcement is welcomed news for the trans service members and families we serve, and for the men and women who have served our country since the beginning of our country's history," said a joint statement from the American Civil Liberties Union, GLBTQ Legal Advocates & Defenders, and

"Anna Lindgren's thesis project for her master's degree work at Yale was done in the Spring/Summer 2014 period," Crewdson writes, via email. "She was commissioned by the New York Times to shoot 30 fashion models in the most inhospitable places in NYC."
