Imagerys real competitor to the Spyder5 Elite is the Spyder4 Elite, and like the Spyder5, it too costs £599.99, £100 more than the Spyder5 Elite. The clue is, however, that it includes a UV light. Is it worth it? Well, initially, there isnt much use for it. So Im doubtful it has that big of an impact on your prints. Datacolor do tell us what the colour temperature is of the LED bulbs that they use in the Spyder5 Elite, and they do make an interesting point about UV light and colour temperature being responsible for the slight yellow undertones that can creep into a picture. They also tell us that in the case of the UV, there is a little blue light shining out too. They go on to point out that these are the problems that exist with any tungsten bulb . I personally found the UV light of the Spyder5 useful in the darkroom. One of the best bits for me was the fact that the UV was outside the power supply. So if my wife got hold of it, there would be no way of tracing it back to me. What about the other claims then? Well, as a colour aficionado, I have an interest in software that is easy to use. So I set about trying to see if they were true. First, I set about finding the white balance settings on the Spyder5 Elite and compared them to the SpyderX Elite. They were very different.The Spyder5 Elite, however, gave me the white balance settings I was already used to, and the SpyderX Elite started from somewhere slightly different and let me adjust the settings of the overall balance of the screen. The Spyder5 Elite seemed like it was designed to be more for the average user than the pro, whereas the SpyderX Elite was clearly designed for pro use.Next, I looked at the Spyder5 Elite 5 main menu pages. They are very similar to the Spyder5 Elite 6. The SpyderX Elite has 6 pages too, but the Home page is unique to the Spyder5 Elite, whereas the 5 main pages are the same as the SpyderX Elite. The Spyder5 Elite has a few little widgets and then the customisation menu with a few shortcuts and settings, whereas the SpyderX Elite has things like profiling/ICC profiles, log viewing/editing and calibration.Next, I looked at the calibration menu on the SpyderX Elite. It has a few different tools for you to use to adjust the screen on a colour level. In a very similar fashion to how you would use the Spyder5 Elite, you click into the profile of your choice, click on the blue keys and adjust, and set the screen the way you want it. You can even add an entire hue to a colour too.That, I found quite easy to use and adjusting the colours on a screen were pretty straightforward.

Theres just something about them. Its the endless rows and rows of options and settings in a menu that doesnt have the simplest of functions and the colours just dont seem quite right. And the generally poor performance in terms of tracking edges, text, and even obvious objects like cars is something that makes you wonder if theres a really simple way to get the colours right. But, as I mentioned earlier, thats not something that is really necessary for a lot of us. We just want to be able to rely on the display, whether it be on the editing side, or on the part where we see the finished image/video and maybe make some small changes from there.The SpyderX Elite however, has completely removed that doubt. It is easy to use, its fast, and it gives you a completely accurate calibration with a lot fewer settings than the Spyder5 Elite. Certainly as easy as the earlier models, but also a lot faster, smoother, and better performing. Also, you dont have to run it a whole lot before it even sees the colours of your prints. (at least compared to the Spyder5 Elite) Sure, the Spyder4 Elite has its quirks. Like all things, its not perfect. As with every product, there are some things that need improving and fixing. But, overall, its a seriously excellent calibration device. In some ways, it performs better in some aspects than the other Spyder device I tried, while in some others, it does perform better. Theyve all improved on their earlier iteration, and in many ways, theyre all better than they used to be. But, this is the best of them. Without a doubt, my top choice as far as Spyder calibration devices go. So whether youre looking for an easy set of easy to use tools to calibrate a display for your photo editing or if youre looking for something with a lot of bells and whistles, the SpyderX Elite is a pretty solid choice.Well recommended. 5ec8ef588b
