(who knew that cp+cp themes had such staying power? according to helayel, the designer who could promise the most varied collection would be the winner.) after i finished the article, i started thinking. i could spend all day on this topic, but i'd rather consider helayel's premise a bit more: cp+cp's role as a platform for fashion from all cultures. i talked to helayel about that, too, and he agreed it was an important factor. (actually, that's what the cp+cp name means: "the brand that is a bridge between cultures," according to helayel.) before the international press returned from the 2005 show, the editors of the international press could easily get in touch with the organizers, who'd give them access. it worked as well as it did in 1995; for the next show, i was able to get into the backstage area as a "subjects only" reporter. one page of my press release was included in the printed program. along the way, i found that cp+cp had a deep commitment to doing things they thought were important. helayel told me that "cp+cp likes to make sure that its shows are inclusive to everyone, and its artistic leadership doesn't bow to the ideas of the fashion world." he said he got that in large part from the "two incredible art directors" he's worked with, marc hofer and fabrice picart, and i do think you can see something of that energy in the show. but this wasn't just a good idea from a woman who works with fashion photography.
