and sometimes the science and the logic of these movies are not as impressive as the movie's characters, settings, and stories. some of the best movies are about the people who are most central to the story, which is what happens in "the departed". if you're looking for a great action movie, "the sixth sense" would be a great choice. "the sixth sense" is a film that is not easy to understand. a patient has supernatural powers that allow him to see the future. however, the patient is not really able to use his powers. the rest of the movie revolves around a police investigation to find out what is going on. it's wonderful that nolan has let himself be influenced by the work of so many modern writers. and it's wonderful that he's allowed himself to be influenced by them. that is not a hint at a lack of his own imagination. interstellar has a bit of a sci-fi feel to it, but the story has more in common with the great westerns of the past. the movie is made up of two parallel stories, one on earth, one on the surface of another planet, one on the surface of our solar system. as with the two previous nolan films, the dark knight and inception, the characters in the story are both real and fictional. the story begins in a reality where humanity is spread across the universe, and then we follow a woman named murph as she leaves her home planet to go to another. the perspective on earth is that of an individual named cooper, who is a shepherd on a farm and whose life is going nowhere. the two parallel stories are those of murph and cooper, and they become intertwined as the two of them make their way together towards each other.

the voiceover at the beginning of the film is a fascinating feature that goes a long way towards setting up the main story of the movie. if there were no voiceover in this movie, no one would know about the characters that are on the spaceship with cooper. even if there had been voiceover, it still wouldn't be clear to someone who hadn't seen the movie that the characters in this story are on a spaceship. we, as viewers, have to find out about this through a voiceover. the voiceover is essential to the understanding of what is going on in the story. we are being told about the characters, and we are being told how they are feeling. we are being given information about what is happening in the movie. in a space of 100 years, humanity expands into the cosmos and encounters races of aliens. director nolan manages to combine over-the-top action sequences, exhilarating visuals, and a fascinating setting into an engaging and entertaining sci-fi movie. it's impossible to overstate the impact that nolan's interstellar has had on the science fiction genre. using a well-known setting as a launching point for a full-blown space opera, nolan takes his hero's journey to a different and interesting dimension. interstellar is a solid, well-made science fiction epic that showcases a great performance from matthew mcconaughey, a terrific cast, and a sparkingly-designed visual spectacle. the general narrative premise seems too simple for a feature film, and nolan has a tendency to throw in unnecessarily complicated plot twists at the most inopportune times. a central idea of the film, that time is a fourth dimension, doesn't really register with the viewer until the very end of the movie, and the first hour or so is spent on tangents about mcconaughey's character and his relationship with his son. and, if you're impatient, you'll be frustrated with the storytelling and pacing as much as i was. 5ec8ef588b
