But I don't understand how I can separate all the text of the file... So I tried this code: `import csv import itertools
path = "C:/Users/Dominos/Downloads/Education-library-Venice.txt" with open(path) as file: r = csv.reader(file, delimiter=" ") next(r) for _ in itertools.count(): line = next(r)` Thank you in advance for your help and support! A: Here is a solution using regex `import re with open('file.csv') as f: csv_data = [re.sub(r'\s+', '', line.strip()) for line in f]` Output: ['Marco Aurelio', 'Meditazioni di Marco Aurelio', 'Download, Facoli, Marco, Padoana quarta dita Marchetta a doi modi (Complete Score). Here is some info on regex: <https://regex101.com> For complete CSV file handling you can use pandas Q: Is there any way to trap a "page load timeout" in Firefox? I am developing an extension for Firefox that needs to detect that a page has not been loaded in five seconds, and take specific action accordingly. The Firefox docs suggest the "page load timeout" event, but I have not been able to reliably trap this using the native JavaScript stuff. Is there some way to reliably detect if the page has not loaded in a given time-frame, or will this need to be done with an add-on/extension? A: I believe you want to use `window.onload` if you want to catch the "page load timeout" event. The "page load timeout" is given in milliseconds. From Mozilla's Page Load Timeouts page: A page load timeout is a result of a timeout associated with the load of an HTML document. If a document, in turn, causes a timeout associated with the load of another document, that second document is not considered loaded. Note that some timeouts are not associated with a document. For example, timeouts associated with loading images, skins, and other third-party resources, and timeouts associated with DOM modifications. `window.onload` represents when the entire DOM is available, so if you look for any conflicts, you may have to use a different event. Memphis Grizzlies training camp is underway, which means only two days until the start of an NBA season that's looking pretty bleak. 5ec8ef588b
