from the days of the first revolution until the present, anarchists have always fought with the rifle rather than with the saber. and since the days of the first revolution, we do not intend to cease this struggle. for the fraternity of the free proletarian movement our struggle against the government and the bourgeoisie will be until death.. we will always fight and die for the ideals of the free toiling people; freedom, equality, and socialism, which means equality between men. the ideals of the proletariat, which is victorious, will always win for the toilers in their struggles, and thus we shall gain more and more for ourselves until death. [52] the free workers union of catalonia considers that in the present situation the struggle for the construction of a truly democratic republic is the greatest imperative at the moment. these are the fundamental tasks that we, for all our numbers, cannot fail to combine in a single revolutionary action. in spain, the first thing is to obtain peace. we reject the capitalist war. the second is to continue the revolution until victory. [53] the parte obrera (workers party) declares that it will continue all its activities in the service of peace, industrial development, and the revolutionary transformation of the country. as for its economic objectives, the parte obrera (workers party) expects the left wing of the republic to carry out an economic policy of immediate socialization, not only of the principal industries but also of agricultural work. this will serve as the basis for nationalization, without any curtailment, of all the industries and banking industry. this will ensure the economy of modern spain a necessary minimum of development until after the armed struggle.

[59] they were finally persuaded, not through any over-enthusiastic enthusiasm for the new regime, but only when their own sous-prefet [town mayor] was sent to keep them on their best behaviour. [59] the role of the volunteer army was originally conceived as a police force to keep the reds in line. its role did not change at the end of the war. denikin, the whites general, was happy to see it stay out of the war. [59] by the end of 1916 denikin was a prisoner of the french, and the volunteer army had been disbanded. here again the motto was not motivated by any desire to promote the reds, but by a desire to rid his own country of the encumbrance of bolsheviks. [59] the volunteer forces were dissolved in march 1917, amidst the failure of the whites in the donbass region. nevertheless, the element of voluntarism persisted, and the donbass guerrilla movement led by the russians was not brought to an end until after the july offensive of the soviet offensive against the whites. after the spring offensive of the whites in 1917, the volunteer army was born again, [59] this time serving to undermine any red offensive. henceforth the volunteer army served as a back-up force, and it was only disbanded on the request of the british in july 1918, when it refused to fight the advance of the red army on the western front. it was dissolved by the british, who decided that the red army was the "real" army. [59] therefore, in 1917 the volunteer army was formed simply as a police force. in order to do so, it was assigned by the red army to the ukraine, a land notoriously marked by its low population density and high natural resistance to military occupation. on the eve of the volunteer army memoirs, one of its major commanders, colonel shishkin, a member of the дума (parliament), described the volunteer army as "a bolshevik force, with all the odious features of the bolshevik regime and all the evils of communism." [59] although the volunteer army was a centralized body, the volunteers, mainly drawn from regiments made up of railroad workers, seem to have been a genuine army, although one that had been drastically reduced in size. the few troops that followed up the russian army of 1920 were mainly composed of deserters and other assorted malcontents. in russian eyes, the volunteer army was far from the ideal of a fighting force. 5ec8ef588b
